In his groundbreaking book, Warren Farrell argues that men and boys are in crisis, and that this crisis is having a devastating impact on women and society as a whole. Farrell draws on a wealth of research to show that men are struggling with everything from low self-esteem and depression to unemployment and violence. He argues that these problems are not simply due to individual failures, but are the result of systemic sexism that has devalued men and boys.

Farrell believes that the devaluation of men and boys has led to a number of social problems, including:

- The rise of fatherlessness
- The increase in male violence
- The decline in male educational attainment

- The rise of male suicide

Farrell argues that these problems are not simply the result of men's own choices, but are the result of a society that has failed to value men and boys. He believes that it is time for women to stand up for men and boys, and to demand that they be treated with the same respect and dignity as women.

Only then can we create a truly just and equitable society for all.
